Where the Ape is Honored.

The ancient Egyptians did not represent the ape as a caricature of man, but idealized it and paid it religious honors, as they did to many other animals. A cynocephalus was kept and worshipped in the temple at Hermopolis, while a cercopithecus was honored at Thebes. Mummies of apes have been found in both of these cities. The ape also has its place in the hieroglyphics as the representative "an," and is called an in Coptic. The god Anubis, who, at the judgment of the dead in Amenti (or the land of death), put the heart of the deceased in the balance of justice in order to report the result to Thoth, is figured with the head of a cynocephalus, or dog-faced baboon. Thoth himself generally appears associated with this attribute of the cynocephalus, the emblem of the dog-star. The temple of Queen Hatshepsut, at Der-el-bahri, is adorned with inscriptions relating to a grand expedition into the balsam-bearing land of Punt, the Egyptian Ophir, in which the offerings sent by the king of that country are described: "The transports were loaded to the full with the wonderful products of the land of Punt, and the various building-woods of the godly land, with heaps of balsams of incense, with green incense-trees, with ebony, with ivory, adorned with gold from the land of Amu, with frankincense, holy balsam, and eye-paints, with cynocephalus and baboons and greyhounds, and with leopard-skins. Never was the like brought to any king of Egypt since the world has stood." According to Brugsch, the incense-tree stood on the deck of the vessels, and the apes, let loose, gambled in the rigging, to the great delight of the sailors.

In the Indian Ramayana, where the animals are praised as allies of Rama, apes are depicted in groups, under the direction of a king who obeys the gods of Rama. They are not, however, introduced as idealized apes, changed men or incarnate demons, but as veritable apes with all their less pleasant peculiarities realistically portrayed. A favorite figure of the poem is Hanuman, the fool of the serious darts, around whom a fabulous atmosphere has already gathered. In him may be recognized the Hulan of the Hindoos, the sacred ape, Semnopithecus entellus. He is an Atlas, who bears mountains on his shoulders. A child of the wind and the air, he flutters the most agreeable symbolism of the simian character.
Like brahman of his misanthropic in the deformity of his lower jaw, which is longer than the upper one. With his loquacious, comic ways, he cheered and comforted Rama's beloved wife, Sita, and helped deliver her from the terrible Lanka, the city of the demon-king Ravana. In gratitude for this, Rama crowned him and embraced him in the sight of both hosts of men and gods.—Dr. Placery, in Popular Science Monthly.

Queer Community in Pennsylvania.

Elias Spidel, of Ohio, formerly a member of the Economite society, of Beaver county, Pennsylvania, has begun a suit to recover $50,000, the value of his share in the society's property. If the suit is successful it will be followed by others of a similar character, and draw a large sum of money from the Economite society's well-filled treasury. In view of this new attempt to establish a claim upon this curious settlement, a glimpse at its history is interesting. It was about the year 1800 that George Kapp, a farmer and vintner, who lived in the region of Wurtemberg, Germany, began to preach in secret the gospel of the Second Adventists.
He was a man of great personal magnetism, with a ready command of plausible lies, and was unscrupulous; so he had a strong influence over the ignorant people whom he addressed. He told them in order to be saved from eternal damnation they must leave the established church of their country, settle either in America or the Holy Land, and wait patiently a few years for the second coming of Christ. Kapp announced himself to be their spiritual leaders with divine authority, and in 1805 he persuaded 125 families to sell their lands and accompany him to America. These immigrants founded the settlement of "Harmony," near Zelienople, Butler county, Pennsylvania. Until they reached their destination the families had paid "their own expenses and helped to their own money; but they hardly settled down when Kapp, by lies and threatened promises, persuaded them to put their money in his hands "as was directed in the fourth chapter of Acts," renounced the right to form an exclusive home for each family, and refrain from marriage as a mortal sin. He taught that man was created physically dual, and that the female element was taken from him "because he envied the beast which went in pairs." Therefore, argued the apostle, marriage is full of Adam's fall, to be avoided lest ye perish. Kapp, having succeeded in breaking the last tie which bound families together, set himself up as judge and jury, of temporal and spiritual king, over the tribe of Harmony. Some of the young men naturally wanted to marry in the course of years, and a few of them, Spidel among the number, left the settlement at various times, but received no share of its wealth as they went. Kapp meantime had destroyed all written testimony to the sums originally "laid at his feet" by the people, and had appropriated as his own $510,000 in coin. When he died he was succeeded by Romelius Baker and Jacob Henrici, who have kept up the old custom. The society has grown smaller by death and desertion until only a few aged members are left, and when they die the property, which has grown to a value of $8,000,000, will go to the state, unless the claims of the heirs are allowed by the courts.
